(Total Marks 20)

Observations of dolphin behaviour have been gathered largely from lucky meetings in the wild or from captive dolphins. From this limited data most scientists have concluded that dolphins are highly social animals. Their relationships with one another seem intricate. Although there appear to be hierarchical arrangements within dolphin clusters, they may also have what one scientist calls an open society, in which members can move from group to group within a larger herd, like humans at a cocktail party.

In captivity they have been trained to perform amazing and often absurd tricks, like towing a dog on a surfboard or shooting basketballs, tricks they apparently can remember for long periods of time. In a celebrated experiment dolphins were taught to present new behaviour leaps, spins, dives and splashes their trainer had not seen the animals perform, but tasks they apparently grasped with ease. Although this experiment is often cited as an example of dolphins being able to understand and use generalized rules, it does not prove that they are unusually clever; the researcher who performed the experiment says she has seen equally impressive creative pigeons.

In the wild, dolphins have shown some ability to adapt to new situations. Kenneth Norris noticed off Hawaii that small dolphin schools learned to identify and avoid boats that were out to capture them. But with larger groups he has seen no evidence that the animals transmit such information. The recent decline in the number of deaths of dolphins trapped in tuna nets is generally credited to improved industry techniques, performance, and gear rather than to any dolphin's having learned to facilitate his own release and informing his friends of his discovery.
